A physics-based horror experience inspired by the eerie, original short story of the same name by indie developer Andrew Plotkin. Created in collaboration with composer Jared Emerson-Johnson, the soundtrack features original music and sound design by Jared and Andrew, as well as The Doppelganger and Kingdom Death: Monster creators, Ron Carmel and Jack Wall. A chilling, horror experience that challenges players' perception of reality and reality itself. Splice features 14 unique locations, multiple endings and a variety of disturbing interactive objects that can do harm to the player. Make your decisions carefully! I have a string of integers, e.g. "42 52 76". They represent positions on a (x, y) screen. I know exactly what the numbers represent (I'm literally using an emulator), but I'm still a bit confused about using strings. How can I transform this string into motion across space? I need to take the numbers I've got, read them off the screen (each is a single point), and then be able to say, "Move (point) across screen, outputting that point, every 100 pixels" or something like that, for me to then take that into the rendering engine and have all sorts of other XNA-ish things happen. I don't want to do it literally with the string, though (not yet). A: This answer has now moved to this question, but I still believe my original answer is still valid in terms of how it solves the original problem, so I've moved it as a cross-post. I don't believe there's a way to do what you want in XNA that doesn't involve you creating a class to represent screen coordinates. So the first

One Life is a game with heart. It may not be for everyone, but if you can persevere, it's one of the best games you'll play in 2016. "One Hour One Life" is more than just a game. It is a journey of a computer and human being's relationship over a period of time. At the end of the game, the owner of the computer is able to reboot it. It's kind of like you're the new owner of the computer. The only difference is that the computer has now fallen in love with you. It will follow you around, wait on you hand and foot, and provide you with love and companionship. The only thing you have to do is decide if you want to accept its love. If you decide to not accept this love, then the game will restart, and will begin anew. But with the reboot, you lose all of the data, and if you restart, your life must begin again. Either way, you will be the owner of a very well-cared-for computer. "One Hour One Life" is an adventure that weaves together a massive story of life, love, and an off-the-wall concept. In this story, a deceased man's soul—that of a little girl—is trapped in a computer. An elderly man takes it in, and after a few months of care, falls in love with the computer. He raises the computer—along with several other robots—as a surrogate family. When his death is near, he sends the computer to his daughter—the little girl from his dream. The daughter then falls in love with the computer, but upon his death, she must choose to take the computer with her. The story is told in four parts. During the first part, the young girl plays as the "mother"—the "virgin soul" of the computer—and the elderly man plays as the "father." In the second part, you take on the role of the daughter as she takes on the responsibility as the "mother." In the third, the daughter accepts the computer as a part of her family. In the final part, we see the aftermath of the daughter's decision, and we realize that the computer's choices were all written in such a way that they
