The following sections include a crash course of Photoshop's editing functions. Organizing your files in a project Photoshop can open a wide variety of file formats, but the ones that are the most common for web images are compressed JPEGs, GIFs, and TIFFs. There are a few other file formats as well, but they're not as common. Photoshop can open GIFs, but it can create only.GIFs. You can find a list of supported file formats at the following web address: www.adobe.com/products/photoshop/techresources/fileformats.html To create web images, start by selecting a JPEG, GIF, or TIFF format. Any JPEG is a valid format and is great for web images, but using the most widely compatible JPEGs saves time and helps with file size. Next, create a new document or open an existing one. A new document is the most basic format, but it takes a long time to start up and takes up a lot of space. Photoshop uses layers, a technology that enables you to move them around and, therefore, easily manipulate an image. Layers work best when you're working with a single image. An image with multiple layers requires a great deal of disk space. (You can find more about working with layers in Book I, Chapter 6.) Unless you have specific requirements for how web images work, you can choose either RGB (red/green/blue) or CMYK (cyan/magenta/yellow/key/black) for web color space. RGB is the industry standard color space, so you should use RGB unless you have a specific reason to use CMYK. Figure 3-1 shows an image in Photoshop. The image is a black-and-white photo of a smog-filled Los Angeles street. An RGB color setting is used in the image, and the name of the file has been changed to CINDY.PSD. Figure 3-1: When editing a layered image, you work on a Photoshop image the same way you would work with any other type of image. 1. Open Photoshop and click the New Layer button (the [+] icon) to add a new layer, shown in Figure 3-2. Figure 3-2: Click the New Layer icon to add a new layer. 2. Click the Adjust
